No, Mortgage Rates Aren't Lower Today!

It's Thursday on a volatile week for the bond market and thus time, once again, to play our favorite game: "no, rates didn't really do that." Sometimes, a majority of mortgage rate headlines say rates went higher when they're really lower. In today's case, rates are much higher than they were yesterday morning despite multiple headlines suggesting the opposite. Who's right? Who's wrong? And Why?

First off, timing matters. Yesterday morning's rates were much lower than yesterday afternoon's rates. This morning's rates were higher still. Finally, this afternoon has brought some relief, but not enough to get the average lender back to yesterday morning's levels. In all cases, this week's rates are definitely not lower than last week's.

The headlines that disagree with that assertion are invariably relying on a widely-followed weekly survey from Freddie Mac. Unfortunately, the survey's methodology means the number released on Thursday at 10am is actually a reflection of best-case-scenario purchase mortgage rate offerings from Friday afternoon through Monday morning. This past Friday/Monday saw the lowest rates in months! The survey actually couldn't have been timed any worse when it comes to unintentionally misleading people about today's mortgage rate reality--especially for people considering refinancing (as refi rates are higher than purchase rates for a majority of conventional loans).

Bottom line on the discrepancy: even after mid-day improvements, today's rates are still significantly worse than yesterday morning's rates--roughly an eighth of a percentage point in some cases.

As for the source of volatility, it had everything to do with the Fed. In short, markets were somewhat surprised by the Fed's rate hike outlook. Granted, the Fed Funds Rate (the thing the Fed would actually be hiking) doesn't control mortgage rates, but the outlook speaks to how quickly the Fed would need to dial back its bond buying programs (aka "tapering"). Those programs definitely help keep rates low. The sooner the Fed begins tapering, the sooner mortgage rates will see some upward pressure. Yesterday was really just a minor (but quick) adjustment in the market's estimated tapering timeline, and it was a bigger deal for shorter-term bonds (which are more affected by Fed rate hiking timing, relative to longer-term bonds). It was actually surprising to see just how much longer term bonds were willing to move in response--a fact that helps us reconcile today's friendly bounce.

About Your Los Angeles Mortgage Broker

Shannon's expertise in residential mortgage lending spans more than 20 years. Beginning on the ground floor of the wholesale side of lending, Shannon subsequently succeeded as a loan officer, account manager, and account executive while working for one of the nation's largest mortgage lenders. In contrast to those who chose to leave the mortgage industry when the Los Angeles housing market began to spiral in 2008; Shannon's passion for helping others to become homeowners remained firmly intact. In fact the changes in the market and new lending laws made her want to help homebuyers to navigate the new rules of real estate lending more than ever. As such, she chose to transition to the retail side of real estate financing in effort to work closer with families, veterans, and those who had previous financial hardships to achieve their goals of home ownership. As a homeowner and real estate investor, Shannon's personal experience in obtaining mortgage loans for her own purchases is extensive. She has bought and sold multiple properties and continues to invest in real estate throughout Los Angeles County. Shannon's specialization and breadth of experience in real estate purchase loans enables her to offer standard/conventional loans, government loans, hard money loans, and specialty/portfolio products.
